There also is one charming picture of an old lady at a the table, painted years ago but never shown anywhere until last summer, when it created a sensation in a retro-spective show of Miss Cassatt's work in specific show of Miss Cassatts work in Paris. The present show is complete enough to be also almost retrospective. It will be a revelation to our young artists and a surprise to elderly enthusiasts for the impressionist school, for it clearly reveals the important place that Miss Cassatt has gained as an

that Miss Cassatt has gained as an artist.

These enthusiasts recognized merit in her work, of course, years ago, upon its first appearance, but at that time when "impressionism" was taboo, the great excitement centred in the violent disputes over Manet, and until the cause for Manet was lost or won every other point in regard to the movement was held in abeyance. When the battle was over and Impressionism victothe was over and Impressionism victorious every one awakened suddenly to the fact that all of these much discussed pictures had vanished into private collections and were no longer accessible to the public. It is to be feared art that deal with questions of contemporary life.

Now that one no longer thinks of the matter of technique in regard to Miss Cassatt—the impressionistic technique being thoroughly understood by every-body—the public will be surprised at the vitality of her work. The method, it appears, was only a mere starting point for Miss Cassatt, life and sympathy with life being the objective point. And so far from being a clever disciple of the great Manet and the great Degas, it now appears that she is great in her own ow appears that she is great in her own and that she has obtained a wide of her own. To paint children with sympathy and the joys of mother-more tenderly would be impossible. The twenty-three works by Degas on lew are all of the very first rank. That is to say, that they suggest life so combetely that the longer they are studied he more bailling they become, for the erret as to how the effects are obtained emains a mystery. Most of them deal with subjects taken from the ballet, and we here see the hard working Parisian whilet girl behind the scenes.

To attempt to single out especial can-ases for comment is almost a waste of me, for all are masterpieces. The pastel two girls, both of the ballet, called grows in haunting sugges-the years. They are seated n a bench in a bare corridor of the ragic. How the artist achieves it one annot understand, but with the simplest trangement of drawing he forces you y to read the minds of the two girls baffles you in a different way from Leonardo with his Mona Lisa, but just

The fact that the Lenten season had come to an end did not need any special demonstration, but doubtless it had its effect on the attendance at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. There were many people in the auditorium. The standing room was crowded, and from these uncomfortable quarters behind the rail came much of the most vociferous applause of the evening. The opera was "Il Trovatore," which ought to have a certain power in these days to bring out people not interested in progress and fond of the old familiar tunes.

The primal cause of an event is sometimes lost in the importance of the event liself. The public owes the exhibition of masterpieces of art by Edgar Degas and Miss Mary Cassatt, which are to be shown at a private view in the Kneedler Galleries to-day, and to the public to-merrow, to the fact that Miss Cassatt is an ardent suffragist.

These wonderful pictures, which have been admired so much for years in private American collections, are now to be shown for the benefit of the suffrage campaign of 1915. Incidentally Miss Cassatt, who already is famous in both iremispheres as an artitle, acquired even a greater fame, and the Degas pictures will create so much comment of an artistic nature that for the moment the question of votes for women will be relegated to the background, although undoubtedly the purse for "the cause" will be plentifully filled before the exhibition has run its course.

Miss Cassatt has sent several of her recent works to this country especially for this exhibition. There also is one
